The evidence is Larry (Kevin James). Want his best friend and fellow firefighter, NYPD Chuck (Adam Sandler) is his domestic partner so that Larry can name his children as beneficiaries of his life insurance policy after the inappropriate passing of Larry's wife. While efforts in the mid-2000s to deal with hatred, the rise of terror has been a reality. Any is dominated by a film that digs a lot of humor from gay stereotypes. In addition to the jokes that dig out of these gay stereotypes (for example, Larry's son is highly suspicious of being gay because he likes music and taps to dance with baseball because obviously homosexuals don't play sports). There's also a humor rooted in fat-shaming, as well as a particularly harsh Asian stereotype that a white man (Rob Schneider) is created to look Asian. Most women are less present than sexual objects, Sandler plays a hot firefighter woman who can sleep five women at once. Strong language throughout (ass a-hole s-t women whore fatboy dick) as well as gay slurs (f-ggot) although tweens and younger teenagers are Sandler fans, they may be too young to separate juvenile jokes from basic well-made messages that have been dominated by juvenile jokes.
